Dear Samara,

I am happy to provide you with the testimonial. Before doing so, I wanted to let you know what attracted me to the Institute for Natural Resources for another seminar since previous to your presentation, I was not acquainted with your work. Before your presentation, I took a seminar from David Logo (my first one with INR), who also presented for 6 hours (on personality disorders, anxiety, and depression) and did a terrific job. I had no idea what to expect, but at the end of the seminar, he spent time going over some of the material on which we might be tested in the form of a review, which I appreciated, as there was a massive amount of info to absorb (not different from your day-long-talk). I might suggest that you consider doing the same. I realize that you provided a syllabus which was certainly a support and very helpful but there were a few questions which were confusing (in my opinion). As a long time mental health professional, I miss the days of in person seminars, when we were presented our certificates at the end without having to be tested. That said, I've taken lots and lots of tests in my day!

Thanks again, for your responsiveness when I reached out. All the best to you, Samara.

Testimonial:

Samara Fritchman, an expert on ethics for mental health professionals, definitely demonstrated her broad command of the subject during the course of a full-day-seminar which I recently attended. Her presentation was chocked full of helpful examples and illustrations, together with appropriate humor and even some surprises--all contributing to the strengths of her presentation. I have been a professional social worker for nearly thirty years and have not only attended many seminars but also given several of my own. Therefore, I can see through both the lens of a student and facilitator. I know what it takes to put on a workshop, as well as what is necessary to hold my interest as a student. Dr. Fritchman did an impressive job, both in her level of preparedness as well as how she delivered information. Bravo.
